

Megan Moskop has been a teacher in New York City schools for over nine years. She currently works as an adjunct lecturer at Hunter College and is a student of Urban Education and Policy in the MALS (Masters in Liberal Studies) program at the CUNY Graduate Center.

Megan was raised in North Carolina, and she's been a fierce, peace-loving feminist for as long as she can remember. She attended Duke University with a Leadership and Service Scholarship and became an educator to help young people gain the skills they need to envision and build a more just world.

To support her teacher-organizing work with MORE-UFT, the social justice caucus of the NYC teachers union, she joined the Women's Organizing Network, where she met Judaline and was inspired by her vision for a stronger society, built by current and future tradeswomen.

Megan loves helping kids discover their potential, teaching gives her the ability to inspire and be inspired. She is delighted for the opportunity to contribute to building a sisterhood in which more girls and women, including herself, get to learn these skills from other amazing women.
